The recreational paperfolding we now know as origami has been around for over one thousand years. It is an ingenious art form, transforming a flat sheet of paper into a finished sculpture through folding and sculpting techniques, and it is often associated with Japanese culture. However, distinct paperfolding traditions arose also in Europe and China, which have been well-documented by historians. Paperfolding crafts were practised in China for centuries and in Europe at the tail end of the Middle Ages. In Japan, the craft began shortly after the arrival of paper in the sixth century, though the name origami wasn't adopted into common usage until the 1800s. It's possible that Chinese paperfolding may have influenced both Japanese and European designs. Yet Japanese origami differs from others in that the paper is rarely cut. In fact, paperfolding designs that require cutting are referred to by another name in Japan: kirigami (cut paper).
