The plague first came into contact with Christian Europe at a Genoese trading settlement on the coast of the Black Sea. In 1345 the settlement of Caffa was unsuccessfully besieged by a Mongol Khan. This Mongol Khan failed in his first attempt to drive out the Genoese, but a second attempt in 1346 proved successful. During the siege, the Khan's camp was hit by an outbreak of bubonic plague. Realising the need to both dispose of the bodies and shorten the siege, the Khan ordered the bodies of his soldiers to be catapulted over the walls, and into the city of Caffa. Within months the citizens were hit by the disease, and fled the city, carrying the plague with them. By January of 1348 the plague had reached France and Tunis. By the end of the next year, the plague had reached as far as Norway, Scotland, Prussia, Iceland, and Italy. In 1351, the infection had spread to include Russia.
